Malignant transformation in human cell lines infected with Epstein-Barr virus (EBV) is under the control of cell-cycle stage-dependent regulation. The human EBV-transformed lymphoblastoid B cell line, HDLM-2, was infected with recombinant EBV which expresses a temperature-sensitive mutant of the viral thymidine kinase gene. The infected cells underwent a temperature-sensitive block of viral late gene expression when transferred to nonpermissive temperatures at early stage of the cell cycle (G1). At the nonpermissive temperatures, a significant fraction of the infected cells expressed EBV early antigens but no expression of EBV late antigens or proteins in the biosynthetic pathways was observed. These cells were transformed after a delay of 1-2 weeks. The majority of the HDLM-2 cells that remained uninfected
